what we have."Keep tissues close, you will need them while reading this sweet love story where love truly shines beyond death.After months and months and months of trying to get a baby there finally is some good news to deliver.. right along with the most horrible day in Abbys life. She should be bursting with happiness but instead finds herself betrayed by her husband, the person she trusts the most. On the same day, in a frenzy to get to his wife and somehow make it up to her, her husband gets in an accident and dies. So there Abby is, alone and pregnant and not even able to really mourn her husband because of the taint his final action put on their whole relationship and the sting that is ever present when she now thinks of him.Now Tristan gets the chance to win (back) her heart, but with only five months in between, the betrayal still stings and Abby is not sure if she should trust Tristan OR her rapidly building feelings towards him.It is agonizing but also very heartwarming to see that even for the obvious perfect couple there are big problems they have to overcome in order to be happy. Be that getting to know the in-laws or having to deal with her slightly mean ex-in-laws and the accusations thrown their way.I cannot believe how easily the author made me love her story and made me believe in how this story worked out. This shouldn't have been easy because I have been on confrontation course from the start, letting the sting of the betrayal flow over me and holding it close, but their love and devotion spoke to me from the start and I finally had to give in and could no longer not love what these two had become. Me, who so rarely cries even in real life, shed tears twice - their love is just so much more than anybody would dare to wish for.
