Hardly spellbinding Von Helen HancoxThe heroine of this story, Zia, is the real focus of the book, although she's hardly under the Highlander's spell. The highlander in question, Artair Sinclare, we met in the previous book by this author. However in this story he seems to have somehow become emasculated and his only action appears to be to follow Zia around, making sure that she gets enough food and saying he'll protect her. His idea of protection is getting her to marry him; once she's a member of the powerful Sinclare family then the various people who are denouncing her as a witch will find they can't get anywhere with the accusations. The common theme in this sort of book, that of the hero having to come to a realisation that he is in love, is rather too hackneyed and feels too unrealistic to work well in this setting. Zia is a rather stereotypical healer - entirely unselfconscious when healing, totally devoted to her patients, liable to do foolish and risky things in the name of healing. She also seems remarkably successful ' there were no deaths of people she was treating during the course of the book which must be very unusual in that time. Perhaps more evidence that she really is a witch! The minor twist at the end with a secret that the Bishop holds wasn't particularly surprising although it did allow the story to be wrapped up well, but also didn't bode well for the Bishop's honesty and integrity in his clerical role. With the rather unbelievable Zia, the nebulous Artair and a subplot about Artair's brother Ronan which wasn't resolved in this story, the book felt rather unremarkable. It is as if it's a transitional book between the author's stories of Cavan, the elder brother, and Ronan, the younger. Artair and Zia didn't really have anything special in the book that will help me to remember it in future. The setting in 16th century Scotland had rather more potential than was realised in the book and the fact that various characters regularly broke out into modern American English meant that this story is not one that piqued my attention or that will stay with me. Synopsis It's Passion not Magic that unites a practical Highland warrior with a remarkable healer. Highland warrior Artair Sinclare is searching for his missing brother. When he finds the one woman who may know the answer, she is being burned at the stake for witchcraft. Ever practical, Artair doesn't believe in witchcraft but there is nothing practical about his attraction to the fiery healer. Beautiful and determined, Zia will not allow anyone to stand in her way of curing the sick. Trained in the ancient art of healing by the grandmother who raised her, Zia comes to realize that only with Artair's help will she be able to do her work. A sham marriage draws Artair and Zia closer together. But will they be able to overcome the secrets in both of their pasts that threaten to tear them apart?
